Not illustrated. 1902 Excerpt: . . . THE OLD CUSTOM HOUSE AT MONTEREY. There is no historic building in the United States around which cluster memories of incidents of the past more interesting than this homely pile of whitewashed dried mud or adobe, now in a state of rapid decay for the want of proper care and protection. It was erected by the Spanish Government in the early part of the last century and served for all government purposes, executive, administrative, legislative, judicial and military. Upon the successful revolution for Mexican Independence, in 1820-3, was turned over to the representatives of the Mexican Government who at once occupied it. Beneath its tiled roof the Junta or Departmental Legislature met and made local laws like a Board of Supervisors. Here the Collector of Customs gathered in both imported goods and revenue, enforcing the provisions of a tariff amounting usually to not less than half their value nearly equivalent to a confiscation of the whole; hence smuggling was considered by the merchant as no crime, if he was not caught at it, while a greased palm, with yellow eye salve had a wonderful effect in reducing the revenue which the Central Government of Mexico expected but scarcely ever received. Here the Governors revolved in office and issued their orders while undisturbed or able to enforce them. Here the espedientes or land grants were made and issued, both genuine and fraudulent, which took the U. S. Land Commission years afterward to decide upon, impoverishing...
